While it's the one of the most important things of the 21st century, the internet is largely (and wrongly) considered a young person's tool. It can be very difficult to encourage the older generations to learn basic computer skills and even harder to teach them to become IT technicians through IT courses. This mindset has resulted in many brands and developers largely ignoring older potential customers because they believe they lack digital literacy.

Many students who attend computer basic skills classes are older adults who were not introduced to computer technology at a young age. It may also be a matter of income. Personal computers are simply not affordable for everyone, especially low-income families. Without a computer at home to practice on, an individual must rely on schools and libraries and may end up with less developed skills as a consequence.
