Quite unlike the Bison, however, animal rights groups and environmental activists such as the Sierra Club are trying to use the State of Colorado to forcibly reunite the Gray Wolf populations in the Southwest with those in northern states such as Montana.

Awoo, Gray Wolves of Denver! | CFACT

The Gray Wolf is coming back to Colorado. And it is creating quite the stir in the Centennial State, by both those in favor and those opposed to the effort. Last week, Colorado voters narrowly approved Proposition 114, which orders the Colorado Parks and Wildlife Commission to create a plan to reintroduce the Gray Wolf to the state's wildlife preserves west of its Continental Divide, and to manage the growth of said population, by 2023.

Gray Wolves Howling Sierra Club Boxed Holiday Cards

The call of the wild...the howl of a gray wolf (Canis lupus) is a powerful reminder of nature's raw strength, beauty, and variety. Wolves howl to defend their territory, often in a chorus of pack members, or in social response to howls from other animals (even humans!). Train whistles and sirens also elicit wolf vocalizations, which can carry for six miles.

This is a landscape shaped, in part, by wolves. Right now it's only a hope for the future, but it could become reality if Coloradans pass Initiative 107, a November ballot measure to reintroduce gray wolves west of the Continental Divide. The measure begins by reminding voters that "historically, wolves were an essential part of the wild habitat of Colorado" and goes on to declare, "Once restored to Colorado, gray wolves will help restore a critical balance in nature."

Gray wolves made headlines in 2011 when OR7—the seventh gray wolf fitted with a radiocollar in Oregon—made a 3,000 mile journey across four mountain ranges, five national forests, four highways, and one interstate in search of a mate. The wolf made its way nearly to Sacramento and back, eventually found a mate, and had three pups in a den close to the California border.

Gray wolf recovery in the United States should be an American success story. Once found nationwide, gray wolves were hunted, trapped and poisoned for decades; by 1967 there were fewer than 1,000 wolves in one small part of the Midwest. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service protected gray wolves under the Endangered Species Act in 1978.
