By grammatical relations (such as subject, direct object, indirect object) we understand structurally encoded standard syntactic relations between the constituents of a clause, in particular between the predicate and noun phrases. Grammatical relations can be characterized in terms of the meanings they express, in terms of their formal means of expression, and in terms of their syntactic functions.

This article presents an overview of the basic issues concerning the relationship between case, grammatical relations, and semantic roles such as agent and patient. In most approaches, semantic roles are directly linked to abstract grammatical relations for the core arguments of the clause. Cases are considered to be a surface expression of grammatical relations.
